

UK keen to recruit Perth teachers for British schools

"Many schools in England are keen to employ WA teachers, as they have a very good reputation and have undergone excellent teacher training."

Perth teaching students know that it can be tough to land their first teaching job, particularly if they don't want to teach in more remote parts of the state. But clued up teaching grads are combining the acquisition of valuable classroom experience with end-of-degree international travels, gaining an advantage over their peers and the adventure of a lifetime all in the same trip.

Gemma Yates of UK teacher-recruitment agency Teach In explains "Many schools in England are keen to employ WA teachers, as they have a very good reputation and have undergone excellent teacher training."

For the past few years some UK teaching agencies have been offering incentives such as free flights to Australian teachers. Now

Teach In is going a step further and bringing UK School Principals out to Perth to interview teachers face-to-face.

"Interviewing face-to-face, rather than via Skype, gives teachers a better opportunity to build rapport with the hiring Principals, as well as to ask detailed questions and get a feel for the school and its leadership. It's also a chance to find out more about the local area, for people make sure they are going to a teaching job and location they will be happy in," Ms Yates added.

Teachers attending these interviews are also able to attend free professional development workshops in classroom and behaviour management. These workshops are particularly useful for teaching graduates who have limited experience in dealing with various behaviour issues in the classroom.

The benefits of international teaching are not just travel and adventure. When Aussie teachers return home, they usually find local schools are more willing to hiring them, due to their experience gained in the UK.

Teach In is hosting interviews between UK Principals and Perth teachers (and teaching graduates) on the 25th & 26th September, for Early Childhood, Primary, Secondary and Special Needs teaching positions.
